"There was nothing petty or smail or selfish," said the Governor, "in the reforms which Herman Ridder unwaveringly supported and ably advocated. His brand of reform was ever of the fundamental nature that sought to give larger meaning and greater value to the nation's promises of liberty, equality and fraternity. The great Hudson-Fulton celebration was largely the result of his enthusiasm and skilled activity. Brotherhood was no idle word to him, but of tremendous significance that possessed his heart and soul."

In relation to Mr. Ridder's treatment of the war Senator O'Gorman said: "lift no period did his splendid character stand out with such impressive dignity as during the twelve or fourteen months preceeding his untimely end. He saw the beloved land of his fathers beset on all sides with armed enemies pressing for its destruction, and he saw the beloved in the land of neutrality assuling with vehement passion the institutions, the philosophy, the culture, the molives and the civilization of Germany.
